In earrying out both of the principles mentbaned, it will be seen that the short should be seconstructed as to allow of its being tightly closed, and also at lesing thoroughly ventilated. Something also depends upon the manner of langing, a heavy growth regulring more room than a lighter one. The rule should be to space the plants, upon the pole or lath so ice not ticernive or press each other, and place poles far enough apart toudnill of a free circulation of air between them. For a fourteen foot pole about litteen pairs of plants of good sized tobacco is sufficient. The same number of laths may be placed upon beaters of equal length. The different tiers should also be far enough aport to allow a draft of air between them. With long tobacco, trouble often arises from leaves of the plants in the upper tiers hanging down and envering the butts of the plants in the tiers below, and so compacting the mass of tobacco
